Archbishop's House,
Dublin.

26th June
1916

My dear Sir John Maxwell

It is only today that I have had an opportunity of answering your letter of the 19th. I have had to leave Dublin and stay in the country under medical orders and I am writing from Co Wicklow where I have been for a few days. I have been trying to come to Dublin and have an opportunity of consulting with my official advisers on matters such as that on which you have written to me. Steps have now been taken

Archbishop's House,
Dublin.

Dear

Faithfully yours
× William Walsh

to apply a remedy but they are necessarily imperfect. I trust they may prove effectual, but I am very hopeful of a completely satisfactory result.

The real difficulty is that there is a very widespread feeling of discontent, already sufficiently strong and, as far as I can ascertain, growing stronger every day. This matter is a serious question whether even action taken from purely human motives for the avoidance of bloodshed may not be misinterpreted with the result that more harm than ~~was taken with a view to~~ good may follow. But we must hope ~~for the best~~ trust, however for the best.

Many thanks for the warmest kindly