NATIONALITY.

SATURDAY, MARCH 30, 1918.

EAST TYRONE

Eighteen months ago Messrs. Devlin and Dillon contracted with the English Government to dismember Ireland, and hand over Tyrone to the government of the Ulster Unionist Council. To assent to the alienation of a foot of Irish soil was in itself a betrayal of all national principle, but this betrayal was made even blacker by the fact that in two counties and one city involved in the treacherous deal by those whom they had trusted, the majority of the people were Nationalists.

The population of Tyrone includes 80,000 Catholics and 62,000 Protestants. Politically, using the words in the widest sense, Tyrone contained about 82,000 Nationalists, 60,000 Unionists. And this Nationalist majority it was contracted with Mr. Lloyd George by Mr. Dillon and Mr. Devlin to cut off from Ireland and place under the feet of Orange ascendancy.

Messrs. Devlin and Dillon and their colleague now dead used all their influence to compass an act of treachery to Ireland. They went to Belfast, and from a packed and terrorised Convention extorted agreement to the disruption of Ireland and the bartering of the Nationalists of the North into slavery. But Ireland revolted against its mutilation. Tyrone flamed out in rebellion against the men who posed as leaders, and the plot to partition Ireland, as Poland had been partitioned 150 years before—as Bengal was partitioned ten years ago—failed for the time.

But another plan has been evolved to secure a similar end—the setting up over the fortunes of all Ulster of permanent Orange control. A man appears in the vacant constituency of East Tyrone backed by the apostles of dismemberment, and calling himself a Nationalist candidate. The Unionists of East Tyrone—48 per cent. of the electorate—meet and decide in private conclave to support this "Nationalist." The "Freeman's Journal" challenges Sinn Fein to oppose him. Sinn Fein accepts the challenge.

This person is a member of the Lloyd George Convention. The censorship prevents us telling the Irish public in the Press what agreements have been recently arrived at in that Convention. The fact remains—a member of the Convention is sent to East Tyrone to secure election. The Unionist Sheriff fixes the date of the election for the day before the "Final Report" of the Convention is to be drafted. The Unionists of East Tyrone decide to support him. If he were elected without opposition, that election would be acclaimed by England as an endorsement of the Convention—as a proof that the Nationalists of Tyrone have receded from the position they took up 18 months ago, when they refused to bow their neck to the yoke of ascendancy.

There are 3,000 Nationalist voters in Tyrone and some 2,800 Unionist voters. Let Tyrone show Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Devlin, and Sir Edward Carson that the vast majority of the Nationalists of Tyrone are not to be duped into cutting their own throats. We fight in Tyrone to show that Nationalist Tyrone stands where it did. We fight it against the alliance of Orange ascendancy and Catholic place-hunter. We fight it to show that the land of the O'Neills will not submit to be governed by the Carsons and Londonderrys; that no Ulster oligarchy with a veto on its life will be set up over it. We fight it to show that Tyrone stands with Nationalist Ireland in demanding for our country its restoration to the circle of the free nations of the world.

WHAT HE HAS SAID

THE PLEDGES OF THE CHAIRMAN OF THE PARLIAMENTARIANS.

THE HOME RULE BILL OF 1914.

We must not accept it as a leverage to get more. That would be dishonourable, and it would be betraying the British Ministers.—Mr. John Dillon, 12th April, 1912.

In my judgment, any attempt to bring pressure to bear on the Government to bring the Home Rule Act into operation while the war is in its present stage would be an act of bad faith on our part. It could not possibly succeed, and would, on the contrary, inflict a deadly blow on the National cause and play into the hands of its enemies.—Mr. John Dillon, June 20th, 1915.

Mr. John Dillon has pledged his "honour" not to seek more than "Home Rule on the Statute Book" and his judgment not to press England to bring Home Rule into operation until she has beaten Germany. How much are his honour and his judgment worth?

THE STATE OF ENGLAND

English lawlessness continues to increase. Moreover, the crimes that are reported daily are without palliation. There is no hunger—no want—in England, as Mr. Lloyd George has lately pointed out. Nor are the criminals influenced by political or economic motives. They are not striving for "self-determination," nor are they trying to avert famine by persistently planting potatoes. In England crime is committed simply for crime's sake. Mr. Max Pemberton, the novelist, writing about the "new outbreak of lawlessness," says that listening in these days to the evidence given in Court "a man might well believe that he was back in the Middle Ages." A Baptist Minister and his son have just been sent to gaol for sheep stealing; the minister, in the judge's opinion, also committed perjury. A Church of England clergyman has been convicted of a series of frauds on a factory cartoon. It looks as if the practice of preaching war sermons from notes supplied by the War Office were having a demoralising effect upon the English Protestant clergy. An English workman the other day threw his dinner, which was badly cooked, into the fire-place, whereupon his wife, in exasperation, retaliated by deliberately killing one of the children. The jury refused to convict, to the mild scandal of the judge, who declared that he could not perceive any reason for acquittal. Grievous assaults on women show no falling off; as for mere wife-beating, it is almost a daily habit. A woman who applied for a summons at Highgate said that her husband had thrashed her for half an hour every day for the last five years. Early in the war there were many sly jests in the papers about the way in which Englishmen who had been beating their wives at home would now proceed to beat the Huns abroad. "If the thump the Germans, lad, th'way th'ast thump me, the Lord help them," was the quaint conceit put by an English journalist in the mouth of an Englishwoman bidding her lord and master farewell. The home traditions, at all events, seem to be carried on by those who have been left behind. What those traditions mean in the way of physical and moral degradation to multitudes of working-class women has been described in detail in the "Nineteenth Century" in articles too detailed and also too unpleasant for quotation.

While crime continues rampant the injustice of English "justice" in dealing with it preserves its most famous characteristics. A man who forged a promissory note and so obtained a sum of money was sent to penal servitude. In the same court a husband who had forged a document and so betrayed an innocent girl into "marriage" with him was simply bound over. To be sure, that was a bigamy case; and "bigamy," as Mr. Justice Lawrence has just been saying at the Birmingham Assizes, "is a crime which the community is beginning to disregard." It is not only the legal code that is being set at defiance. The canons of morality are openly flouted as well. England has never been a moral country, though she is in the habit of assuring the world that she is. Today she is worse than ever. There is here a question of real importance to Ireland. "Young people," said the "Daily Mail" in a lead interval a few months ago, "who are attracted to English industrial life are not only lost to Ireland, but become easily corrupted and ruined by associations against which their inexperience and natural simplicity afford them no protection." Of the nature of these associations ample evidence is available. "There are working-class districts," says Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, "both in the North and in London where there are more mistresses than wives." A charitable mission appealing for funds quotes figures to show that one child in every eight is without a legal father. These are the ascertained cases, but what of the unascertained? Anyone who has ever listened to the scores of undefended divorce cases that are gabbled through the Court in the course of a day or is acquainted with what goes on in English society, especially in English country houses, will see nothing unreasonable in the estimate that at least one child in every four is illegitimate origin.

"There never was a time," says Dr. Saleeby, a prominent writer and lecturer on national health, "when there was so much immorality among the young people of the country." A very well-known woman writer has published an article in which she describes how quite young girls "of obviously good bringing up and of quite as obvious respectability" go about to hotels and restaurants alone, try to pick acquaintances with officers, and never rest until they have succeeded in "getting off" with some total stranger. Last summer several of the open spaces in London were filled in broad daylight with men and girls sprawling wantonly on the grass in each other's arms, and were not fit for decent people to walk through. One of Lord Northcliffe's papers writes vehemently about the "dirty sluts of fifteen to eighteen years of age," the "gangs of young female ruffians and thieves, often fashionably dressed," who infest the streets. A criminal judge sentencing an Oxford man to a year in gaol for "objectionable conduct," in which two officers were his accomplices, remarked upon the "astounding number of similar cases," and declared that the depraved condition of the West End of London was "simply appalling." It is not surprising that the Y.M.C.A. Commissioner from New Zealand, describing the moral atmosphere in England, said that when the overseas lads arrived in London they arrived in hell." A notable feature about all this immorality is that it is not due to want of money, or greed of gain, or concomitant drinking or excitement. A medical correspondent of the "Times" states that as the result of a "systematic inquiry" that in three cases out of four it is simply a matter of vice on the part of those who are vicious because they like it.

The irreligious tone of the country has had an extraordinary illustration in a spectacle presented twice a day for months in succession at a fashionable London theatre. It is a theatre of varieties of the kind to which well-dressed "respectable" men and women go and, in the afternoon, bring their children with them. There was a ballet—in which, by the way, lights were not worn, and the women's limbs were bare. One of the dances represented a wedding. An altar was pushed on to the stage from the wings; the half-naked bride and bridegroom knelt before it; and there entered a man garbed as a priest in cassock and surplice, who made the sign of the Cross over their heads. Worse, if possible, was to follow. The dance was resumed, the priest at first remaining stationary, but as the movements grew ruder and wilder a meaning smile came slowly into his face, and then suddenly he, too, danced, jiggling lasciviously in his robes backwards and forwards beside the representation of the altar of God. Upon that scene the curtain slowly descended to a storm of English applause!

Among the recreations provided for English soldiers at the front are licensed houses of ill-fame. As the Dean of Lincoln has shown in letters to the "Times," the French local authorities have protested, but while the War Office declares that the French military authorities are responsible, it refuses to bar these places to the British troops; nay, it thoughtfully has entries made on camp leave cards stating the hours when the particular streets are not out of bounds. Mr. Macpherson, Under Secretary for War, has defended these establishments, "human nature being what it is," in language with which the English "Nation" has dealt faithfully, but which out of respect for the sanctity of womanhood we prefer not to quote here. There have been protests in many of the newspapers, and the Executive of the Labour Party has denounced "these dens of vice," but public opinion refuses to be excited. There is a limit apparently even to English hypocrisy.

The moral of the whole disgusting story of lawlessness and depravity is that Irishmen will do well to live their lives as much apart as possible from English influences. And the less we have to do the better with the English printed garbage that pours constantly into Ireland—those worthless and demoralising publications referred to in the Bishop of Meath's Lenten Pastoral "that hold up religion to contempt, that ridicule virtue, and that represent pleasure and amusement as the only business of life." H. I.

THE WAR.

The German High Command appears to aim at a "battle of annihilation" against the English armies. The battle of annihilation is sought to be delivered by striking the English right wing, separating them from the French, and forcing them northward to the sharp angle of the coast whereof Cape Grisnez is the apex.

The nature of the Picardy country—unenclosed farming land for the most part—is a considerable help in this respect if once the tactical front is broken. Further north the industrial villages of Artois, and further north still the canals of Flanders, would make forward movements, especially of cavalry, more difficult.

In the whole area between the present fighting front and the sea there is no continuous natural defensive line; the country is level and open, and all the rivers—whether flowing into the Scheldt or into the sea—follow a general east-west direction, parallel to the line of a German advance. For the rest, communications both by road and railway are excellent.

The English bases are outside their right flank: their chief harbour is Havre, seconded probably by Rouen and Dieppe. Dunkirk, Calais, Boulogne, Etaples and Abbeville would not be adequate or very suitable for the full traffic. The Somme cuts in two the English war zone; the area to the north of that river includes the French Channel coast, which it is imperative for them to cover; the area to the south of the river is equally vital for reasons of supply and co-operation with the French. Thus it is of vital importance to them to control the Somme crossings.

The Somme crossings focus on two centres—Amiens, which is the great inland base of the English armies, and Abbeville, which, though not at all as vital as Amiens, is still a valuable secondary centre. In general, the battle zone is now some 26 miles from Amiens and 60 from Abbeville. If large numbers of troops are moved from the Ypres-Armentieres zone to this southern flank the northern sector of the English line would presumably be attacked. And it now seems possible that the Germans are strong enough to compel the French to stand fast in their own positions instead of reinforcing the English.

IRELAND AND THE PEACE CONFERENCE.

In the course of a very powerful speech in Cork on St. Patrick's Day to a meeting of over 15,000 people, Mr. Liam De Roiste, dealing with the Peace Conference, said:—

"What is the case that Sinn Fein has made on behalf of the Irish nation for Ireland's claim to be heard at the Peace Conference, the case that we are asking you to endorse? The demand in effect is this: That from history, from tradition, from the manifold expressions of her people's will for centuries, from the armed struggles she has made in every generation against a usurping power, from the viewpoint of international law, from the principles of justice, from the effects of foreign government in the country, by the distinctiveness of national characteristics as embodied in language, history, tradition, culture, Ireland has a right to Sovereign Independence, the Irish nation has a right to the complete and absolute mastery of its own destinies. For over one thousand five hundred years, from the dim days of the beginning of the Christian era to the Battle of Kinsale, the Irish conception of Statehood held sway in Ireland, Irish Sovereignty remained unbroken. We claim that the British Government has no moral or legal right, no sanction in equity, justice, or international

FRIEND or FOE ?

What is YOUR Answer?

Let us face facts squarely. Every Irishman who invests his money in foreign securities is an enemy to Ireland. When you take out an Assurance Policy with a foreign Company you help the foreigner to crush Irish enterprise and throw your own countrymen out of employment. Do you want to be Ireland's friend? If so, keep your money at home. Assure yourself with an Irish Assurance Society. By Irish we mean an Assurance Society that is managed, owned and worked exclusively by Irishmen and Irish money. The City of Dublin Assurance Society is a genuinely Irish Society, and it is the most prosperous and enterprising Assurance Society in Ireland. Its terms are attractive, and its financial standing rock-solid. Apply for prospectus and particulars to— CITY OF DUBLIN ASSURANCE SOCIETY D'OLIER CHAMBERS, DUBLIN.
